MORGAN O'CONNELL

The following is an account of his life in the Dictionary of National Biography, and appears by the gracious permission of the holders of the copyright.

"O'Connell, Morgan (1804-1885), politician, second son of Daniel O'Connell (1775-1847) [q.v.], was b. at 30 Merrion Square, Dublin, 31 Oct. 1804. In 1819, General Devoreux came to Ireland to enlist military help for Bolivia. He succeeded in embodying the Irish South American Legion, and O'Connell was one of the officers who purchased a commission in it. The enterprise was mis-managed; there was no commissariat organisation on board the ships, and a part of the force died on the voyage. The remainder were disembarked on the Spanish Main, at Santa Margarita, where many deaths took place from starvation. A portion of the expedition, under Fergus O'Connor, effected a junction with Bolivar, and to the energy of these allies the Republican successes were largely due. O'Connell returned to Ireland after a few years, but only again to seek foreign service in the Austrian Army.

"On 19 Dec. 1832, he entered Parliament in the Liberal interest as one of the members for Meath, and continued to represent the constituency till Jan. 1840, when he was appointed 1st Assistant Registrar of Deeds in Ireland, with a salary of £1,200 a year, a place which he held till 1868. In politics he was never in perfect accord with his father, and his retirement from Parliament was probably caused by his inability to accept the Repeal Movement. During his parliamentary career he fought a duel with William 2nd Baron Alvanley, a lt.-col. in the army, at Chalk Farm, on 4 May, 1835. A
